Mihi quidem in vita, servanda videtur illa lex, quæ in Græcorum conviviis obtinetur: "Aut bibat," inquit, "aut abeat." Et recte. Aut enim fruatur aliquis pariter cum aliis voluptate potandi; aut, ne sobrius in violenvoluptate potandi; aut, ne sonrus m violentiam incidat, ante discedat. Sic injurias fortunæ quas ferre nequeas, defugiendo relinquas.—It seems to me that that rule which holds in the feasts of Greeks, is to be observed, too, in life: "Either let him drink," they say, "or begone." And with justice. For either let a man enjoy with a theme the pleasure of drinking: on let him others the pleasure of drinking; or let him first depart, lest he, being sober, should meet with any violence. So you may escape the injuries of fortune, which you cannot endure, by fleeing from them. *

Verba de præsenti.—Words promised on the instant as a pledge for the future. Law.

Verba facit mortuo.—He speaks to a dead man (i.e. wastes words). Plautus. Panulus, Act 4, 2, 18.

* According to Suetonius, at the public triumph after Julius Cæsar's victories in Pontus, these three words were displayed before Cæsar's title, "non acta belli significantem, sicut ceteri, sed celeriter confecti notam"—(not as being a record of the events of the war, as in other cases, but as an indication of the rapidity with which it was an indication of the rapidity with maintifunction concluded). Suctionis does not ascribe the words to Cæsar, but Plutarch, writing a few years later, in his "Life of Julius Cæsar," says that after Cæsar had defeated Pharnaces at Zela, in Pontus, a kingdom of Asia Minor (B.C. 47), "in the account he gave to Amintus, a proper the provider of the prov (B.C. 47), "in the account he gave to Amintus, one of his friends in Rome, of the rapidity and despatch with which he had gained his victory, he made use of three words only, 'I came, I saw, I conquered.'" Plutarch adds to this that "their having all the same form and termination, in the Roman language, adds grace to their conciseness." There is no authority for the frequent misstatement that the words were applied by Cæsar to his expedition to Britain (B C. 55), which was only partially successful.

Verba fiunt mortuo. — The words are spoken to a dead man (i.e. are thrown away). Terence. Phormio, 5, 8, 26. away).

Every man has his weak side.

† "Quoth the Merteine," an imaginary author of proverbs. In the old English as well as the old French collections of proverbs, it was usual to put them into the mouth of an imaginary personage. A survival of this custom is recorded by David Lloyd (1625-1691), who states that Sir Henry Washington (of the same family as George Washington) was so distinguished for his bravery in the Civil War, on the Royalist side, that it became a proverb when a difficulty arose: "Away with it, quoth Washington." Every man hath his ill day. (G. H.)

Every man is as God made him, and very often worse.

Cada uno es como Dios le hizo, y aun peor muchas veces .- (Span., Don Quixote, 2, 4.)

Every man is either a fool or a physician after thirty years of age. (R.)

This originated in a saying attributed to the Emperor Tiberius, who died A.D. 37, aged seventy-seven. The authorities are as follow, and it will be seen that they are contradictory :-

"I have heard that Tiberius used to say that that man was ridiculous, who, after sixty years, appealed to a physician."—Plutarch. De Sanitate tuenda, Vol. 2.

"He (Tiberius) was wont to mock at the arts of physicians, and at those who, after thirty years of age, needed counsel as to what was good or bad for their bodies." Tacitus. Annals, Book 6, chap. 46.

The version of Tacitus is corroborated by Suctonius ("Tiberius," chap. 68), who states the emperor was accustomed to have the most unfailing good health, "so that from the age of thirty, he ruled himself according to his own judgment, without the help or advice of the physicians."

Every man at forty is a fool or physician. (R. Sc.)
